FOOTPRINTS OF FEAR

I had two daily big news programs on the Inter-Continental Radio Network. I gave the news and also an analysis of it to millions of people in this country. The slogan, "Bob Brennan Broadcasting," was a familiar one to listeners of all ages. Our network had correspondents in all parts of the world. And at least three times a year I would take trips to important centers where news was vital. It might be East Germany, Japan or the Near East.

During that particular week we were getting strange reports from the area bounded by India and Nepal and at the base of the Himalaya Mountains. I guess in one form or another most people have heard of the legendary "Snowman." Human or beast? That was the perplexing question. Reports from travellers as well as from porters would always fit into the same pattern. A series of tremendous footprints in the snow.

So at the end of the week, Mr. Collins, president of the network sent for me.

"Bob," he began, "This is the kind of an assignment for which you must have a special man. And we feel you are the man who can handle it. Make arrangements to fly to this area. Then get a party of the best mountain climbers and go up the Himalayas. Only one order: Is there a snowman?"

Soon the wires began to buzz. I contacted Otto Sneller, the famous Alpine climber. Would he join the expedition? Of course he would. Then I contacted Dr. Frank Bailey, the expert on high mountain medical effects. And we even got the famous Dahli Baranti to do the tough work of organizing the porters and preparing the needed materials.

We had to work fast. Two weeks later we were at the base of the Himalayas outside the village of Markaha. What a place that was! People from all over Asia seemed to congregate here. You saw camels and oxen brush against Fords and Cadillacs. There were so many languages and dialects spoken that it would be impossible even for the most learned man in the world to understand all of them.

Jim Garney, my assistant, was in charge of the crew that set up our broadcasting unit. We gave three daily one half hour programs about the purpose and progress of the expedition. In addition we made tapes and took movies of a lot of interesting scenes.

Then came the report from one of the travelers who was brought to our tent.

"Big footprints. You see them. I show them to you."

So the expedition started ahead of time — Dr. Bailey, Otto Sneller, my assistant and myself. We had a special walkie-talkie so we could contact home base and thirty porters to carry the needed supplies. In addition we had skis and snowshoes. We started in a light snowfall. This traveler who went with us called himself Ghenkis Raha. He looked like a very old man but we found he had the ability to keep up with us. Strange, as I now look back upon it, was his refusal to take any money for his services.

We climbed only three hundred feet the first day and took it easy. We had some small portable tents with us which we set up. We watched the sun vanish and a strange red colored moon took its place in the sky. The porters were beginning to get scared.

"Snowman waits for Moon like this in the sky," one told us. "It is not a good omen."

However, they remained with us and we continued on our way. It took us three more days to reach the 1500 foot level of the mountain. Now I realized something peculiar. The higher we were getting, the more distant the top looked — like an object within the reach of your hand — yet always evading you.

We had supplies to last us one month. Arrangements were made so that additional supplies were to be dropped by helicopter. This was done whenever the weather was bright. A green color marker was attached to the parachute so we could spot it. Thus we would be able to renew our supplies constantly.

At the end of three weeks the weird event happened. Ghenkis Raha spotted the trail of the big footprints. We all went out to see them. They were gigantic. But there was one trouble! I couldn't see them. Dr. Bailey pointed to them and spoke to me softly.

"Look how clear they are. See that big toe and the imprints of the other toes. The creature must walk upright."

"Can't see a thing," I insisted. "Something must be wrong."

Offhand it would be simple to say that I was suffering from a mild case of snow blindness. Ghenkis Raha, who also spoke English seemed very much upset.

"Look down and you can see clearly where the Snowman was walking."

I looked and looked but to no avail. All I could see was the white snow, and the only impressions on it were from the shoes of our own men. We set up camp and learned that our walkie-talkie couldn't contact the base. Jim Garney checked it over thoroughly.

"Can't figure it out," he admitted. "Might be the atmospheric conditions. But we can always signal the helicopter with the flares we have."

The next day we broke up camp and continued the ascent to the top of the mountain. We had with us small tanks of oxygen. When we found the going too rough, we planned to set up our last camp. Jim would remain with the porters. The three of us would then go on alone. One of the porters refused to go ahead.

"I go back," he whined. "Otherwise Snowman get me."

Fear is contagious. Of course they were scared. The accumulated effect of the legend was starting to tell. But if one started back, they soon would all desert us. As long as the helicopter dropped supplies we could survive without the porters. We were trying to talk some sense into them, when Ghenkis Raha informed us he had seen the trail again and also the imprints.

We all followed him and sure enough there were the big footprints for everyone to see — except me! I still couldn't see them. No matter what they said — I still didn't see those footprints. But this time all the porters with the exception of one had decided to return to home base. I was angry. What was the game of Ghenkis Raha? As though he were deliberately trying to scare the men. But one porter, Ali, announced he would remain with me to the end.

"The Brave One," he called me, "has no fear in his heart. I follow him to top of mountain. You are all fools. You go back and perhaps to your own destruction. Fear is a destroyer."

It would have been futile to stop the porters. We worked out a division of supplies. There were six of us left — including Ghenkis Raha and Ali. We sent up signal flares and the helicopter dropped more supplies, but also a warning which read: "Blizzard starting. Suggest you abandon climb."

We signalled back we were going ahead. Slowly we went upward for the next three days. And each morning the big footprints were visible. It was late at night while I was sleeping that I felt a tug on my sleeve. Ali was next to me with his finger on his mouth for silence. I quickly arose and followed him. There in the eerie night we saw Ghenkis Raha making those big footprints with the aid of a large stencil!

He spotted us and threw a knife at me which missed. I whipped out my gun and fired at him — but also missed. The shot arose the other members of the camp. We started to chase Ghenkis Raha when suddenly IT appeared! I guess it was about five times the size of the largest elephant I ever saw. Ghenkis Raha ran almost right into it and then screamed for help as the creature grabbed him with two gigantic arms. I figured IT was some kind of an animal, and we all fired but to no avail. The creature vanished and so did Ghenkis Raha.

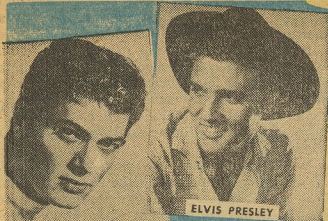

We returned slowly to our base and learned the porters had all returned safely. They were ashamed for being cowards. We tried to check on Ghenkis Raha but learned nothing about him. The only sensible deduction we could make was that he probably planned to rob all of us and perhaps lead us to our destruction.

But what about the footprints I didn't see? When we came back to the United States, my eyes were given a thorough check. "20-20 and nothing organically wrong with either eye," was the report. Dr. Bailey suggested I see Professor Howard Thompson, the famous psychologist. He suggested this explanation:

"You were so determined the Snowman didn't exist that you blocked yourself in the trace patterns. Hence though the footprints were real, because they had been made with a stencil, you couldn't 'see' them because you didn't want to see them. It is possible you might never have seen the Snowman, had it not been for the fact that this creature came out unexpectedly into your perception. But what it was is something beyond my ability to explain or even conjecture."

So that's the way it has to end with perhaps this thought: That Fear often exists within us and not outside of us.
